I really am trying my best to write a proper blog, but every time I sit down to do it, the tears just start pouring. Because I have nothing left to say. Or rather, because I have everything to say, but I just can't bring myself to do it. So my words are taking longer to write than they were to tell you last week, when we discovered Dan's brain cancer, and as I tell you it has all happened so quickly, I need to go back even further to describe what has been happening over the last ten months. When we got back from our honeymoon, in the middle of September last year, Dan's brain tumour was just that; a tumour. A small lump on the base of his skull, which had been measured in an MRI scan a few weeks before we returned, and since then has been getting bigger, and it is now the size of a walnut. It is malignant. The doctors are still not quite sure what type of brain tumour it is. According to the books, it is a craniopharyngioma, which is benign, and has a high survival rate. They are less certain that it is in fact a craniopharyngioma. But they think that it is, and that it could be malignant. And that's the most important thing. There is not much else we need to know, as the scans are, we know, showing 82157476af
